To study the muscular adaptations to sustained resistance exercise, ten healthy men underwent weight-lifting exercise for 6 wk. The average of 1 repetition maximum (1 RM) for the two exercises was used as the maximum strength. Each subject exercised at 70% 1 RM of leg press for 5 times per wk and at 70% of 1 RM of squat for 3 times per wk. One RM of leg press increased from 21.0 +/- 6.4 kg to 32.3 +/- 8.0 kg and that of squat from 18.6 +/- 4.7 kg to 28.5 +/- 6.5 kg. The body weight did not change (from 79.2 +/- 10.5 to 78.7 +/- 8.0 kg). Both exercised and nonexercised muscles were morphologically examined histologically, and the activities of enzymes related to the fiber size were investigated. Muscle mass in the trained leg was increased significantly after 6 wk of exercise, whereas the nonexercised muscle remained constant in both size and histochemical features. The activity of creatine kinase was significantly increased in the trained leg. Biopsies from both the exercised and nonexercised leg muscle were characterized by type II fiber hypertrophy, with hyperplasia of the mitochondria. In addition, a population of type I fibers was recruited and the fiber composition of the trained leg was changed. The data suggest that fiber hypertrophy induced by muscle contraction was a normal adaptive response in this study.Q: Can you create a UUID with a GUID-like system? Currently we are building a REST API and are using UUIDs for all the objects in the system. I am concerned that if a person changes the UUID then it will break the system. I am trying to figure out the safest way to generate a UUID and ensure that the UUID is unique across the system and cross-platform. My initial idea for getting a GUID to UUID converter is this: Create the GUID with a v4 UUID algorithm (random bytes or is this random?) Remap the GUID to a UUID using a custom algorithm However, the only thing I found is this:
